The Observatory welcomes their release, which took place in response to a wide protest movement which started in Bahrain on February 14, 2011 and thanks all the persons, institutions and organisations who intervened in their favour.

However, the Observatory remains concerned by the fact that the charges of forming an illegal organisation with the objective of overthrowing the government and dissolving the constitution", "forming an illegal organisation with the intention of overthrowing the basic system of the country", "participating in the forming and organising and inciting to overthrow and change the political system of the country", "forming an organisation that deals with collecting funds in an illegal manner", "inciting and planning terrorist acts", "inciting hatred and contempt against the regime", "agreeing to and inciting others to damage public property and committing terrorist acts", "spreading false information", "inciting others in public methods to not abide by the laws", "inciting hatred against a certain sect", "inciting acts of burning, resisting authorities and demonstrating", "contacting and working with international organisations", and "receiving funds from international parties".

In addition, the Observatory urges the authorities to carry out a thorough, independent and impartial investigation into the allegations of torture and ill-treatment made by several of the mentioned human rights defenders, the result of which must be made public, in order to bring all those responsible before a competent, independent and impartial tribunal and apply penal, civil and/or administrative sanctions as provided by law.

More generally, the Observatory urges the Bahraini authorities to guarantee the rights of all human rights defenders and organisations in Bahrain to carry out their human rights work without hindrances in conformity with the United Nations Declaration on Human Rights

Defenders, adopted by the UN General Assembly on December 9, 1998.

Background information:

Between August 13, and September 4, 2010, the above mentioned human rights defenders were arrested and accused notably of alleged membership to a terrorist network aiming to overthrow the government. Fourteen political and religious activists belonging to the Shi'a community were also charged in the same case<sup>1</sup>.

Since the beginning of their trial, on October 28, 2010, all hearings were marked by vivid debates around allegations by the accused of acts of torture and ill-treatment inflicted during the pre-trial stage and even after the first hearing, as well as on the necessity for an independent medical check-up and exhaustive inquiry into these allegations, as the case file was built mainly if not exclusively based on confessions from the accused. The defense also protested against the restrictions imposed on the right to visit the accused held by families and lawyers and highlighted that only one copy of the criminal case file had been handed to all of the defense lawyers. They further reported attacks made against the accused and their lawyers in Bahraini media, reportedly tolerated and even fueled by the Public Prosecution, in violation of the principle of the presumption of innocence.

The defence requested the suspension of the case until the completion of an exhaustive investigation on the allegations of torture, including medical check-ups by independent doctors but the requests were always ignored by the court<sup>2</sup>.
